Drawing is the visual language that we use to express our ideas or emotions. Sometimes the gulf between what we see in our mind and our ability to get that image on paper is very wide. The gap can be narrowed through practice and careful observation.

The aim of this course is to give the student a foundation in the elements and principles of design through the practice of drawing with the intent to develop skill. The study of various artists and their reasons for making art will help to expand the student's conceptual approach to their own art.

Grading Policy

Grades are computed on a point system. Each project or assignment will be assessed against criteria from the project rubric. Students will also be graded based on participation in class critiques. Critiques are important. Some critiques will be informal and one on one. Group critiques require your work to be in a state of completion, or nearly there so that you can benefit from the discussion. You have the option of re-working projects. The new grade will be averaged with the original grade. Extra time for this will be decided based on the project and how much revision is necessary. This policy is designed to encourage you to think of art as being in constant flux. Late work will have a letter grade reduction for each day it is late.

Class Presentations

Various artists and their work will be investigated. Students will be required to work in collaborative groups or individually to prepare presentations for the class. Class time will be allotted for some research. Some will be on your own.

Homework

Plan on having homework. It may be in the form of sketching to work out your ideas, composition or gathering resource materials.

Exams

You will have a project that will act as a midterm at the end of the first semester weeks and a final project at the end of the semester. Failure to turn in the project or be at the final critique may result in an "F" for the course.

Attendance

You must be here. Remember this is a college class and unexcused absences could result in a grade reduction.
