KAP History is a challenging course that is meant to be the equivalent of Kenyon College courses numbered 101 and 102. With a C or better (and payment of fees) a student can earn up to eight semester hours of college credit. Emphasis of the class is on critical and evaluative thinking skills, essay writing, interpretation of original documents, and historiography (the study of techniques used in historical research). One of the main goals of the class is to identify large themes that existed and evolved to give us our American culture. This course is a thematic survey of American History including lectures, discussions, readings, and etc. that will examine the rich American history of our country.

The class will have a primary text and many supplemental readings. Pay special attention to the calendar for due dates of the readings for these supplementals. In addition to in class documents, you will be asked to read whole or in part three books during each nine weeks. Some of these books you will be asked to buy.

In addition, I am asking that all students keep a writing portfolio this year. This will entail a copy of all of your written work (prior to grading). This portfolio will be turned into Kenyon professors for review and to evaluate the class. In other words, you will always turn in two copies of your work.

One special requirement of the class is to stay on top of your reading. You will find this is probably the most difficult part of the class. You will be given a calendar for each nine weeks that gives you specific due date so there is never a question on when things are due. Hence, no late work will be accepted. The key for doing well in this course is understanding that history is not dead – it constantly affects your reality and it is dead, we are all affected by the ghosts of the past!

Two special objectives of the class:

- a.) Show mastery of broad body of historical knowledge.
- b.) Demonstrate the use of your historical thinking skills.
- c.) To develop a college-level writing style.
